A Comparative Analysis: The Media and the Military the Civil War through September 11

Relations between the media and the military have been strained probably for as long as the media has been covering military actions. Much like commanders today, Civil War General William T. Sherman mistrusted the press and was concerned that reporters would publish information that might be useful to the enemy. He also worried that publication of Northern military mistakes might have a devastating effect on the public morale. General Sherman believed reporters were in the same class as spies and should be shot on sight (Hendricks, 1992, p. 46).

The nature of war coverage was different during the Civil War than it is today. Reporters present during battles were often the last to get their stories told. Word of mouth quickly spread news of battles, and reporters not physically on the battlefield were often able to get enough information to write and file

Sanctuary for a Persecuted Faith
On a hill in Haifa, the Baha’i religion’s spiritual center is a gorgeous monument to survival.

The Baha’i temple sits on a hillside in Haifa, Israel, overlooking the Mediterranean Sea. The temple is one of the most significant sites in the Baha’i faith, as it was here that the founder of the religion, Baha’u’llah, delivered sermons and conducted his daily prayers.

The temple is made of white marble and has a central dome surrounded by smaller domes. The dome is adorned with gold leaf and the walls are covered in intricate mosaics. The temple is surrounded by beautiful gardens and fountains, creating a serene and peaceful atmosphere.

The Baha’i faith is a monotheistic religion that was founded in Iran in the 19th century. The religion’s teachings emphasize the importance of unity among all people, regardless of their differences. The Baha’i faith has grown rapidly in recent years, with over 9 million followers worldwide.

The temple in Haifa is a symbol of the Baha’i faith’s commitment to peace and unity, and it serves as a place of prayer and reflection for both believers and non-believers alike.

EXCEPTIONS TO THE RULE
Internet is becoming more and more popular ("Internet is hot", 2014, p. 5)

According to the article in Plagiarism on purpose? (2010) plagiarism is the result of a lack of knowledge about referencing (p. 5).

Reference List:

Example: Publication with an unknown publication year

The most used payment method in the Netherlands is iDEAL (Swaen, n.d., p. 7)

Reference List:

The Internet is the global system of interconnected computer networks (Swaen, Drissen, Van Laak, & Corrieri, 2014, p. 15). It is a network.

The Internet carries an extensive range of information resources and services (Swaen et al., 2014, p. 20).

The origins of the Internet date back to research commissioned by the United States government (Harris et al., 2015).
Authors with the same surname

If the surname of the first author appears often in various sources, then you also use initial of these authors’ first name, even if the publication date is different.

Example: Authors with the same surname

K.J. Driessen (2013) describes as does B. Driessen (2007)....
How does one become successful? Ted Driessen, a researcher from UCLA states, “There are generally three understood causes that contributes to a person success in their industry"
An indirect citation

It sometimes occurs that you find in one source an interesting citation to another source. When you can’t find this other source, you may refer to it indirectly. You then write: ‘as cited in’. In the reference list, you only note the source that you have consulted. In this case, that is Swaen.

Example: Indirect citation

Three possible causes are described (Driessen, as cited in Swaen, 2014, p. 1).
Mentioning the same author and publication again within the same paragraph

When you reference the same publication within the same paragraph in the running text, you don’t have to mention the year again.

Example: Cite author again in paragraph

Research by Swaen (2014) shows that there is a great need for an APA Generator (p. 15). Swaen also noted that this tool should be offered for free....
